Law360 published the article “Lessons From 6 Months Of Calif. Privacy Law Litigation,” discussing the California attorney general’s final draft of proposed regulations pertaining to the California Consumer Privacy Act (CCPA), which took effect at the beginning of the year. The authors do not expect a slowdown in the pace of consumer class actions alleging some form of a CCPA violation. They said the next six months will see “a flurry of continued activity in both consumer class actions and state enforcement.” To read the article in its entirety, please click here.
